

Ygdrasil

A JOURNAL OF THE POETIC ARTS

January 2016

VOL XXIV, Issue 1, Number 273

Editor: Klaus J. Gerken

European Editor: Mois Benarroch

Contributing Editors: Jack R. Wesdorp

Previous Associate Editors: Igal Koshevoy; Evan Light; Pedro Sena; Oswald Le Winter; Heather Ferguson; Patrick White

ISSN 1480-6401

Table of Contents

INTRODUCTION

Michael Ceraolo

June 2, 2015

traveling around the watershed:

People

CONTENTS

Michael Ceraolo

Machines

Weather

Neighbors (People and Otherwise)

Donal Mahoney

Bugs and People

Old Quilter, Old Poet

Marimba in the Afternoon

They Were Refugees, Too

White Butterflies and Gram

Simon Perchik

This fish is still gathering the smoke

You feed these birds at night

And stubborn yet these wicks

You stir this soup as if each finger

This thin sheet has no strength left

Milton Ehrlich

HOW LONG CAN IT LAST?
MEMORY OF AN UNFINISHED POEM
A HERO PACKS HEAT
UNCIRCUMCIZE ME PLEASE
DAY OF INFAMY

Tamas Panitz

from, Uncreated Mirror

Joseph Farley

The Sludge Swimmers of Shenzhen
among the shadows
the price of fame
Everyone loves a good story
The Pool Table in the Park
night blooms
Found and Lost
Hustled

john sweet

not the end of everything, but still hangman
the forest's edge and what we found there gut-punch sweetheart blues

Don Mager

May Journal: Sunday, May 5, 2013
May Journal: Tuesday, May 7, 2013
August Journal: Thursday, August 22, 2013
October Journal: Sunday, October 13, 2013
October Journal: Thursday, October 24, 2013

POST SCRIPTUM

john sweet

dog

Introduction

Michael Ceraolo

June 2, 2015

traveling around the watershed:

People

1

"he don't look so good I think he's coming down with ammonia" 2

The sign on the bus said
"Take only one seat"
and
"keep aisles clear"
but a sizable minority of riders ignored those directions with impunity

3

She got off the bus, walked two steps away, then turned and scurried back on, able to re-board because the bus was still waiting for the light to change She mentioned the number of a connecting bus route and the driver asked her which way she was going on the connecting bus
She didn't answer directly,
but did say she knew how to get there

Michael Ceraolo

Machines

1

An automated voice called out each bus stop, with interesting if incorrect pronunciations of some street names
and a complete inability to recognize HTS as the abbreviation for Heights

2

The car was old enough to have license plates identifying it as vintage,
but it didn't have them, nor had it been treated as such:
it had sat in a corner of the parking lot all winter, surrounded
by piles of plowed snow,
and
the light green of the rest of the car was nothing but rust on the roof

Weather

1

The temperature was normal, maybe even slightly below average, yet
some complained of being hot: they were wearing dark clothes (not uniforms of any kind) that absorbed the sunlight

2

We haven't had snow in June in my lifetime, but today
there is a blizzard of a different snow: the fruit of the Eastern Cottonwood tree, heavy enough to leave measurable accumulation in some places

Neighbors (People and Otherwise)

1

A neighbor waters his lawn even though we've had adequate rainfall this spring The water evaporates in the heat, forming the most common greenhouse gas that will make such watering necessary

2

A neighbor spread chemical fertilizers on the lawn, spilling some of it on the sidewalk, the only warning such a thing was done

3

A doe and her fawn are in the neighbor's yard Fortunately,
 it's not the one with the chemicals on the lawn

Donal Mahoney

Bugs and People

No season of the year is best for being homeless though autumn warns the worst is near and those who sleep in doorways want to learn their options as to where it might be best to spend the winter while those who spend summer in the garden sneak under doors and over transoms.

Folks step on bugs indoors and bring their winter needs for shelter to an end.

This time of year before the holidays, folks with roofs are toasty while homeless bugs and people aren't although it's true that fewer bugs have to live outside all winter.

Old Quilter, Old Poet

She's been making quilts for half a century and he's been making poems that long as well and every now and then he brings a chocolate shake to her place so they can take a break and talk.

He always finds her at the frame, peering through thick lenses.
"I'm still house bound, Walt," she laughs and likes to say.

Once she told him quilts are poems.
She works with scraps of cloth and he with scraps of words and quilts and poems are never done until all the scraps are where they have to be.

Now she's working on a Double Wedding Ring, a quilt not unlike a sonnet in that both follow patterns of their own but she likes crazy quilts because she can improvise with scraps she finds on floors around the house.
Her job's to make something beautiful from scraps others might throw away.

He has no problem understanding that.
He saves scraps of words and marries them in ways some folk find odd or useless.
Finishing her shake she says maybe they play jazz and just don't know it.

She likes Miles Davis and puts his album on when a crazy quilt won't go her way but she would never listen to Miles while she's at work on a Double Wedding Ring.
Yo-Yo Ma, she says, is the man for that.
The old poet says he would never disagree.

Marimba in the Afternoon

Raul is a kind man who plays marimba in a salsa band at LA clubs late into the night.

Some afternoons he plays at a nursing home in Cucamonga where he was born, grew up and dashed home from school.

He's paid with a taco, maybe an enchilada,
a burrito now and then.
On Sunday a fresh tamale almost as good as his mother used to make after being in the fields all day, long ago.

Old-timers in the day room bounce in their chairs, some on wheels, to Raul's music.

Long ago they were young and danced all night in tiny clubs after being paid a few dollars a basket for picking grapes and plums under pounding sun.

They Were Refugees, Too

They were refugees, too, back in the Forties, settled in Chicago,
learned English,
some a lot, some a little,
found jobs of some kind, made do like their neighbors until things got better.

And by the Seventies, on hot summer nights they were loud and happy gathering on Morse Avenue around parking meters in the dying sunlight outside one of the delis lining the street to argue about the Cubs or politics or anything they could disagree upon.
If someone made a point someone else made a counterpoint.

Arguments squared off with cab driver against lawyer, handyman against accountant, all of them equal as a people.
They were survivors of the holocaust, some with forearm tattoos shouting under short sleeve shirts, others with tattoos silent under long sleeves worn to the office that day with a tie.

Chicago had welcomed them thirty years earlier and now they were giving back, working and sending their children to college after making a life and a neighborhood their own.

White Butterflies and Gram

Gram tells Stella on the phone her neighborhood is full of old folks.
She hasn't seen Stella in 60 years and won't see her again because of the canyon of miles between them.

But Gram insists on keeping Stella current on her neighbors who die when the seasons change, although Stella's never met one of them.

Gram tells her Tom Murphy's wife died around this time last year when the Monarch butterflies took off for Mexico.
And Mary Kelly's husband died the day Gram saw her first robin of the spring.
It was a bad year, Gram tells Stella, pointing out Father Flynn passed away at the start of winter when the juncos came to bicker with the mourning doves on the floor of Gram's porch, fighting over seed spilled by cardinals from the feeder.

The cardinals and jays stay all winter, Gram tells Stella, and look beautiful in the blue spruce surrounded by snow.
Too bad you live so far away, she says.
You'd like it here when autumn comes.

Now the only visitors are white butterflies, Gram says, the little ones most folks ignore in summer when Monarchs rule the garden.
Monarchs look as if Tiffany designed them but they're more beautiful than any lamp.

Gram doesn't know if the white butterflies go to Mexico the way the Monarchs do but says they don't look strong enough to make the trip.
Then she wishes Stella the best of health, says she hopes they'll chat again next year and begins a litany of long good-byes.

Simon Perchik

*

This fish is still gathering the smoke left over from when the sea went back to face some crackling beach grass —side by side you too are warmed by salt and standing naked you can see a woman is striking a match though when you are dead the glaze on this dinner plate will afterward heat your eyes —they will never close, this fish is looking for tears to fit in its mouth tell you eat! bite into its eyes though nothing will cool or be at home where you keep the ashes warm by collecting the bones and sand.

*

You feed these birds at night the way every feather they use comes from a quarry where the air darkens with each landing —it's Tuesday and you still have not forgotten their return for seeds, endlessly weeping for a missing child a brother, mother though their eyes are unsure how to close when listening for a name, a flower a river —you fill your hand from a bag as if at the bottom they could hear an emptiness that is not a night falling behind step by step on the ground —how open it was, already grass.

*

And stubborn yet these wicks warm the light they need to blossom as stone

then cling, smell from hair burning inside, clawing for roots heated by butterflies and the afternoons coming together to the light the fire, be a noon where there was none before

*

You stir this soup as if each finger is warmed by the breeze though your eyes close when salt is added —small stones could bring it to life overflow with branches, berries, wings shimmering and far away dissolve into a sea that has no word for sitting at a table, naked waiting for you to turn on the light wrap your arms around a bowl that's empty, a night no longer sure it's the rim you're holding on to that's circling a man eating alone who can't see, hears only the waves becoming lips, colder and colder.

*

This thin sheet has no strength left spread out as a bed no longer interested in love though the edge still folds in taking hold a frayed promise pulling it to safety word by word —look around, what was saved is paper shrinking into curls and hollows has a face, a mouth —all in writing has the silence, the forever death listens for —what it hears is the unfolding face up the way moonlight has never forgotten your fingers are constantly unpacking paper as the frail sound oars make when bringing back a sea that was not cared for :this note all this time forgotten, in a box half wood, half smoke as if it once lit up the world.

Milton Ehrlich

HOW LONG CAN IT LAST?

How many times can you brush your teeth, make a bed, rub toes and noses together, toast a bagel and brew a cup of Constant Comment tea before you get whacked in an uncertain world.

The heart, a lonely pump, with no guarantee.
Rivulets of blood
clogged with debris, ennui becomes an everyday friend, lifelong pals fade away.

Prosperity here today and gone tomorrow.
Unexpected illness and accidents lurk around the corner.

Dreaming and scheming to survive. Whipsawing change, from one day to the next, the only thing you can count on.

Breathe deeply, one breath at a time.

MEMORY OF AN UNFINISHED POEM

In the middle of the night, we hear a muted trumpet rendition of the haunting melody from La Strada.

My old lady drops her flannel nightgown, emerges like a butterfly from it's cocoon, and dances madly like a flying Twyla Tharp.

Her body has the finesse of a Stradivarius violin.
The dance sets free dust motes from Tankas on our bedroom walls that become a cloud of fireflies with green-eyed patinas of love.

They whirl to the rhythm of the film's wistful tune as moonlight glints off the head of our laughing gold Buddha.

After she collapses in an exhausted heap, we hear the voice of Fellini, demanding one more take.

A HERO PACKS HEAT

Increasingly forgetful, my friend can't remember who he is or where he is as he gets lost in heroic reveries.

He's convinced he has a gun, but it's just his extended forefinger and upright thumb.

Whenever he passes a bank, he practices pointing his gun at a smiling guard at the door who thinks he's just saying, "Hi!"

A Korean War veteran, he thinks he held back the Chinese at the Yalu River, allowing his company to retreat while he manned a Browning
.50 caliber machine gun, like the hero in his favorite movie:
"Guadalcanal Diary."

When it grows dark
on late afternoons, he points his gun
at his head.

UNCIRCUMCIZE ME PLEASE

Return my foreskin coat of armor.
It keeps the barbarians at bay

I can't get the stench of black smoke of crematoriums out of my nostrils.

An uncircumcized penis, my best defense against the next time enemies of Jews come looking for me.

Ever since Jews were driven out of Judea six thousand years ago, they've been nothing but trouble in a world that loves to hate Jews.

If we're so smart, with so few of us, earning 129 Nobels, compared to Muslims, earning 2 Nobels, how come we can't learn how to stop being persecuted by everyone?

When Jews returned to their homeland in '48, they found their troubles were not over.

Now they're overcome by the stink of gunpowder blowing towards them by Islamic fundamentalists, who never learned what it is to be human.

Jews continue to hunger for the light of sanity.

DAY OF INFAMY

Early one Sunday morning we cuddled in dad's bed, waiting for him to wake up.
We listened to his rasping breath before tickling him awake at an agreed upon time.

His breathing was rattled and deep, reminding us of a whale with a clogged blow-hole.

We couldn't wait to get to the City to see a show at the Paramount or Roxy, and lunch at the Automat, on baked beans, steaming hot chocolate and lemon meringue pie.

Minutes dragged on. Bored, squirming around, we did hand puppets shadows on the wall

When dad finally got up to shave, we turned on the Philco in the living room.
Moments later, running to him asking breathlessly, What's a day in infamy?

With war declared, we were too young and dad too old to serve, but, he volunteered to be an air-raid warden.

Years later, when dad told us he had cancer, like a vine frowning wild inside me, his emaciated body looked like a homeless hound, all skin and bones, a shadowy version of his former self.

At the hospital, we sat by his side, listening once again to his breathing, wondering which breath will be his last.

Tamas Panitz

from, Uncreated Mirror

1.

Light seen from the heart.
Shapely familiar,
heart watching mind

she broke the mirror on me, sparks traipsing through lives that wise material

enough words for us to see this is what I had to tell you whatever starts to say.

2.

Non verbis, sed rebus, Roses of Sharon held over a running stream.
Wash the facts off, those sins it's even easier than killing to silence; cover the quiet insistence of things.

The walls scarred deep with leprosy.

3.

Tree rushes through tree the moment in its precision, you can see it look, through the silky edges of your apple.

4.

Led me here, another alphabet camping on the lawn, waiting, certain as a handful of almonds concerto for some other sunset, all you need to know is here the many books of what one couldn't say fresh eyed gnomes ambling through the startled cabbages.

5.

I was plucked from the water those first five numbers we learned in wisest Africa counted me and never let me go marketplace busy with doves fabrics dyed with urine subtle lingering metals reach into the crowded morning great and terrible as Abraham sun like a scales balanced succeed this rickety cart to be greater than the sun forget who's speaking in the bustle of things run off with the whole sky with your hands.

6.

Come home and remember numbers don't tell you what's next an underworld anxious to advise you.

7.

Ambient light of pale leaves leaves rattle Evensong in wood-speak loss of distance in blue as it gets toward dark everyone's four feet tall and the hills sing their sweet songs to me entre chien et loup they call it because the stores close and Villon comes out because the surface, that old masonic secret when you touch there's only depth, nesting under context frail elves holding our silly human tools banter in the phony alphabet the words doubted me and did their own thinking secrets the whole obliging woods memorized a word at least on every leaf.

8.

All the religion you need, a couple lazy words at midnight written in your mother's journal more reliable than the sun that silence in heaven thirty minutes you can always hear anxious Canadians throwing beer cans on the field cut open the silence, open the light, scratch deep in what remains some reliable bible, biblion any scrap of papyrus confetti half trodden into the street because there is no other book that's all we know, another nobody from nowhere your whole ontology lightning-flash when you unbuttoned your shirt to cold rain I trusted that thought for not thinking, easy inhabitants angels standing in the middle of the road the people of stories, of memory, I watched you from across the sea listened so hard you saw, I had to be very small a character of necessity, wave like a cabby whipping my horse all that you've forgotten seashell pristine in your hand.

9.

I like you. First things speak, first step her telos stepping beyond the dance to where I held my knife above the clouds.

Every poem is a love poem threatening you with its dagger. Threatening to love the comfortable world away again. So put the horse on the roof. Hold your hand and let it pray. Save what you have because there's more than everything to give. Terribly more.

10.

Neighbor drying her sheets always unclean by the weekend I tug the cloth off its pins over my head my unseen arm is long drapes wide over the country, you walked out warm, smelling of leaves synapses soldered onto the zoetic country look out your glasses and let the trees think for you.

Joseph Farley

The Sludge Swimmers of Shenzhen

The beach was small, the sand was dark
And made of large granules.
I watched the bathers
And thought to join them,
But Li Xing stopped me, Pointed to the open pipe Dumping raw sewage
Into the ocean
A hundred yards away
From where families
Laughed and played.

among the shadows

there are people who tell you
they exist, but you know they are just shadows on the wall.
they move
and they talk, but they have no true form.
you listen
and you watch, but they soon fade away as soon as the lights are turned down.

sitting alone
in the dark,
you might reach out for a hand,
that may,
or may not,
be there,
but you reach for it anyway.
what you grab
may just be sheets.
what you have lost
may be even less.

the price of fame

there was a time before cameras were everywhere and our lives were films studied by the police and FBI and managers and masters all watching and looking and reading our lips
if not listening in directly on all that was said.

how quiet and personal were those eons before everyone was a celebrity and government and bosses
and store owners all turned paparazzi

tell me
in a whisper, draw a figure with your finger in the palm
of my hand, let us pretend for a moment we can live and communicate alone.

Everyone loves a good story

I love to hear the sound of your sweet lies,
so pleasing to the ear, but I can see the other side in your big brown eyes.

What should I think of you?
Should I think of you at all?
Or just remember where the door is as I am heading down the hall?

The Pool Table in the Park

In Shenzhen you pay the fee For a small paper ticket That lets you walk in the park; Stroll manicured paths Between groomed bushes and trees;
See the fish pond stocked With large red and white carp; Stumble upon a pool table In the middle of a lawn Where the local sharks hang,
Studying the crowd
And polishing their game, Waiting for some country sucker
To come along and take up Their cold eyed challenge.

night blooms

the moon is dripping on the flowers.
white petals
that should be closed wink and yawn
in the cold light.
tomorrow
they will need to sleep late and not see the sun until noon.

Found and Lost

The penny you find
Is the penny you lost.
The heart you break
Becomes your own.

The earth splits
And spews out fire,
Lifting one shelf of rock And lowering another.

These quakes and eruptions Keep the system going.
Plates move slowly,
But watch out when they do.

People wear adult masks Hiding the faces of children.
Under muscles and makeup,
They still play in the sandbox,

Throwing things they shouldn't,
Hurting would be friends, Running in the wrong direction
When it is time to go.

All that comes and goes Came and went before.
All the songs we sing
Are just so much sound.

We rattle the bars of our cribs, Wanting out and wanting more Love and pleasure to fill us, Forgetting how easy it was to give

Before the ground shifted
And we grew tall While becoming So very small.

Hustled

God and the devil are conspiring in a dark alley behind a tavern.

We are the dumb marks set up for the fall.

They talk in whispers, occasionally laughing and pointing in our direction.

They are plotting out our lives, all the twists and turns, the good and the bad,
the annoying and confounding, the colorful and the bland.

They roll the dice and place bets on every possible outcome, knowing no matter how absurd a human existence may become, we will continue to play along, because, even if it is just a game, it is the only game in town.

john sweet

not the end of everything, but still

crows on a roof worrying bones in the early-afternoon rain just this just silence shot through with the hum of powerlines

a meaningless sound like the voice of god a question of so much flesh & blood gone missing

hangman

you inside the sacred circle and yr lover outside the door with a bullet in his head

no small amount of magic a mirror facing its darker twin and then an infinite number of walls inside the prison of your mind a dream of your father and of his father before him an unbroken line of suicides all those sad grey songs of infinite joy that no one ever sings anymore

gut-punch sweetheart blues

they fucked up out on the highway too many dead and then the witnesses had to be killed too the cover stories amended all flags re-sewn in brighter shades of hatred and glory but we ate like kings for a month we spread the lie that the war had been won built our palaces that much closer to the sun

Don Mager

May Journal: Sunday, May 5, 2013

Crinkling, drying thin and heading to their land of the forgotten, blooming Wisterias scattered through the trees watch their better days sift away. They are neither yesterday nor never.
In crass contempt of them, morning breaks into now's arpeggiated fife, piccolo and flute trills. The wide yard, Cypresses on one side, Apples the other, hosts quadraphonic Robin choirs. Their responses and calls sing out hello and sunrise. Full of song, the lofts have no time yet for the ant and worm breakfast spread across lawn's buffet.

May Journal: Tuesday, May 7, 2013

The mower trudges through tall rain engorged weeds and grass. It skids on early morning's slopes like grease spilled floors. The blades gag on the thick wet concoction. Savory hay spews barn loft furrows out. Well-worked shoes soak green stains up into squishy socks and blistering toes. Merciless, the steaming engine grinds and trudges on. Helplessness sprawls before its path. Three-foot tall pink and blue Irises lie broken in the lawn. The mower gulps them down. Bright confetti shreds cough out and stick to damp sweatpants legs. All morning, morning is a stopped stop watch.

August Journal: Thursday, August 22, 2013

Shadows from the streetlights whisper cool kisses along the nape. They lick at ear lobes. They tickle leg hairs. In the ditch beside the road, grass is dark, wet and shaggy. It calls to the stooping silhouette: Kneel low. Reach. Feel around. In the dark, wrapped in its plastic sheath, the morning paper waits. Midges flit around the groping wrists. They search in vain. Knees decide instead to sip at the mud. Like halos of cool breaths, damp snuggles though the shirt. It stumbles to stand. With glasses wiped, predawn fog walks hand in empty hand back to the porch.

October Journal: Sunday, October 13, 2013

Two small Downy Woodpeckers bobble up the up-stretched arms of the pecan tree and tail first bobble back down.
Late afternoon overflows the back yard. Their dapple stripes and wings are black like gleaming coal. And like fresh snow, their white head stripes and chests glow. Their dapples dart and bob, while squirrels and Mourning Doves pursue methodical patient searches through the dry grass and fallen leaves, and in a flash they fly away.
Senseless to pied and downy beauty, the long arms of the pecan flutters their drowsy song in the late-day warmth

October Journal: Thursday, October 24, 2013

Pre-dawn driveway crunch strolls down to the street where early cars, like oars swishing through dim shallow currents, swish through the night fall of leaves. Solitary in the crisp air, the stroll stalls in the center of the road looking both uphill ways. Each hill is splashed with pools of streetlight light. Each a full circle. Each flecked with glints. From the horizon, a low drone wakes the consciousness of ears. Ahead of it, while stillness fondles chills down and up the watcher's bare arms and legs, a sunlit arrow slides silver through the seamless dark sky. The chill strolls back.

Post Scriptum

john sweet

dog

let all the little deaths add up build walls without windows or doors

you are one sorry motherfucker
 but what other choices do you have?

creepy-crawl blind down the interstate feeling the good heat of the sun bake into you

bleed from the hands from the knees from the darker corners of your heart

nothing matters
 when everything counts

baby looks so pretty digging tiny graves understands that every needle is filled with the pure white light of christ

Copyright Information

All selections are copyrighted by their respective authors.

Any reproduction of these poems, without the express written permission of the authors, is prohibited.

YGDASIL: A Journal of the Poetic Arts - Copyright (c) 1993 - 2015 by Klaus J. Gerken.

The official version of this magazine is available on Ygdrasil's World-Wide Web site <http://users.synapse.net/kgerken>. No other version shall be deemed "authorized" unless downloaded from there or The Library and Archives Canada at <http://epe.lac-bac.gc.ca/100/201/300/ygdrasil/index.html> .

Distribution is allowed and encouraged as long as the issue is unchanged.

Note that simultaneous submissions will not be accepted. Please allow at least 90 days for a reply.